【例題】(早稲田大学 国際教養学部 入試 典型形式・改題)

Read the passage and answer the questions that follow.

The word "cosmopolitan," from the Greek for "citizen of the world," has enjoyed an unusually long career in moral philosophy. It was used in the fourth century BCE by Diogenes the Cynic, who, when asked where he came from, is reported to have answered that he was "a citizen of the world." More than two thousand years later, the Enlightenment thinkers — most famously Kant — returned to the term to describe a moral attitude that would treat the well-being of distant strangers as no less weighty than the well-being of one's own neighbours. To call oneself a cosmopolitan, in this tradition, was to refuse the narrowing of moral concern that other loyalties — to family, to nation, to confession — tend to encourage.

In the early twenty-first century, cosmopolitanism enjoyed a quiet renaissance. Philosophers such as Martha Nussbaum and Kwame Anthony Appiah argued, in influential books, that the dramatic increase in cross-border movement of people, capital, and culture made the cosmopolitan ideal newly urgent. If our economic decisions touched the lives of workers ten thousand miles away, the argument ran, our moral imagination ought to extend at least that far. Universities expanded their international programmes; corporations adopted language about "global citizenship"; foundations funded conferences on cosmopolitan ethics. For a moment, the case for thinking beyond the nation appeared not merely defensible but obvious.

That mood has since cooled. A series of political shocks — the British vote to leave the European Union, the resurgence of nationalist parties in democracies that had been thought to be safely cosmopolitan, the sharp public reaction against high-volume migration — has obliged even sympathetic observers to reconsider whether the ideal had been oversold. The cosmopolitan disposition, critics began to argue, was less a universal moral attitude than the particular taste of a particular class: those whose education, income, and professional life had placed them outside the dense local attachments that still organized most lives. To speak of "global citizens," in this view, was to mistake the experience of a small elite for the destination of human moral development.

The critique deserves a careful response rather than easy dismissal. There is something accurate in noticing that the strongest exponents of cosmopolitan ethics are often those for whom the costs of cosmopolitan policy are most easily borne. The professor who calls for open borders rarely competes for jobs with newly arrived migrants; the financier who praises global capital flows is rarely the one whose town has been hollowed out by them. To brush these observations aside as mere resentment is to confuse the source of an argument with its substance.

Yet to concede the critique fully would be to surrender too much. The fact that an ideal happens to be congenial to a particular class does not, by itself, show that the ideal is wrong; the abolitionists of the nineteenth century, after all, were drawn disproportionately from comfortable backgrounds, and we do not now treat slavery as defensible on that account. The harder question is whether cosmopolitan principles can be reformulated in a way that takes seriously the partial loyalties — to neighbourhoods, to professions, to fellow citizens — that most people actually live by, without abandoning the demand that the suffering of strangers should weigh in our deliberations at all.

Some recent philosophical work has tried to occupy precisely this middle ground. It accepts that we owe special obligations to those near to us — that the wholly impartial agent imagined by classical utilitarianism is neither possible nor, perhaps, desirable. But it insists that these special obligations are not unlimited, and that the existence of partial loyalties does not extinguish the more general duty to consider the interests of those beyond our circle. On this view, cosmopolitanism is best understood not as the demand that we treat all human beings identically, but as the demand that we never treat the merely distant as if they did not count at all.

Whether such a reformulation can survive the political weather of the coming decades remains to be seen. What seems clearer is that the older, more confident cosmopolitanism — the one that imagined itself as the inevitable horizon of moral progress — is no longer available. The ideal will have to earn its place again, in argument with the partial loyalties it once expected to dissolve.

Q1. According to the first paragraph, what did Enlightenment thinkers such as Kant mean by "cosmopolitan"?

- ① A person who frequently travels between cities for commercial purposes.
- ② A moral attitude that treats the well-being of distant strangers as no less weighty than that of neighbours.
- ③ A diplomatic official representing one's nation abroad.
- ④ A philosophical school that rejects all moral obligations.

Q2. Which of the following is NOT cited as a factor in the early twenty-first-century renaissance of cosmopolitanism?

- ① Increased cross-border movement of people, capital, and culture.
- ② Books by philosophers such as Nussbaum and Appiah.
- ③ The expansion of international university programmes.
- ④ A sudden military alliance among the major democracies.

Q3. What is the central criticism of cosmopolitanism raised in the third paragraph?

- ① That its proponents were insufficiently educated in the history of philosophy.
- ② That it was less a universal moral attitude than the particular taste of a globally mobile elite class.
- ③ That it was a foreign import imposed on European democracies.
- ④ That it produced inadequate economic growth in the developing world.

Q4. Why does the author argue that this critique "deserves a careful response rather than easy dismissal"?

- ① Because the critics are politically powerful and cannot be ignored.
- ② Because the costs of cosmopolitan policy are often borne by those least likely to advocate for it, giving the critique a real foundation.
- ③ Because cosmopolitanism has been refuted by recent scientific findings.
- ④ Because international institutions have officially abandoned the ideal.

Q5. Why does the author refer to the abolitionists of the nineteenth century?

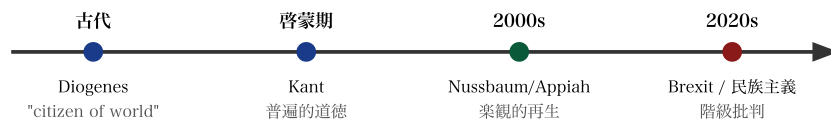

- ① To suggest that abolitionism, like cosmopolitanism, has failed.
- ② To illustrate that the class origins of an ideal's supporters do not, by themselves, show the ideal to be wrong.

- ③ To recommend that contemporary readers return to nineteenth-century texts.
- ④ To argue that slavery was actually morally defensible.

Q6. Which of the following best summarizes the author's overall conclusion?

- ① Cosmopolitanism has been decisively refuted and should be abandoned.
- ② The older, confident cosmopolitanism is no longer available; the ideal must earn its place again in argument with the partial loyalties it once expected to dissolve.
- ③ Nationalism has been definitively shown to be morally superior to cosmopolitanism.
- ④ All philosophical attempts to reformulate cosmopolitanism have proven futile.

コスモポリタニズム — 楽観論から再考へ (2000s → 2020s)

著者の結論: 古い楽観は不可能 — 部分的忠誠と対話して「再獲得」する必要

図 1-1 コスモポリタニズムの 2500 年史 — 古代 → 啓蒙 → 楽観的再生 → 政治的
反動

第2章 (解法の全体方針と武器整理・3 分)

SILS の長文は「歴史的素描 → 楽観論 → 批判の登場 → 反論 → 再定式化」の 5 段論法。

【ジャンル分析】

本文は典型的な (A) philosophy of cosmopolitanism essay。著者は 7 段かけて、コスモポリタニズムの 2500 年史を圧縮し、最終的に「再獲得が必要」という慎重な肯定で締める。(B) SILS の長文は哲学・国際関係論の現代的論争が頻出。

【本問で必要な 4 つの武器】

- ① (A) 思想史の連鎖を追う (Diogenes → Kant → Nussbaum/Appiah → 現代批判者)
- ② (B) critique → counter-critique の往復 を捕捉 (第 3-5 段の論理戦)
- ③ (C) 抽象的哲学用語の文脈推測 — "disposition" "partial loyalty" "impartial agent" "moral imagination"
- ④ (D) 著者の立場 = 修正主義的擁護者 と読む (批判を認めた上で擁護を再構築)

【各設問の戦略 — 段との対応】

Q1 (Kant の定義) → 第 1 段 "moral attitude ... distant strangers as no less weighty"

Q2 (NOT 設問) → 第 2 段の renaissance 要因リストから除外要素を消去法で

Q3 (階級批判) → 第 3 段 "particular taste of a particular class"

Q4 (批判への共感) → 第 4 段 "costs of cosmopolitan policy ... most easily borne"

Q5 (修辞設問・abolitionist) → 第 5 段 "class origins ... does not show the ideal is wrong"

Q6 (全体結論) → 最終段 "earn its place again ... in argument with the partial loyalties"

第3章 (Q1 — Kant 定義設問・3 分)

SILS Q1 は思想史の核心概念を聞く。第 1 段で即決。

【設問】 What did Enlightenment thinkers such as Kant mean by "cosmopolitan"?

★ Step 1: 第 1 段の Kant 部分を抽出

"the Enlightenment thinkers — most famously Kant — returned to the term to describe (A) a moral attitude that would treat the well-being of distant strangers as no less weighty than the well-being of one's own neighbours."

★ Step 2: paraphrase 対応

本文 "moral attitude ... distant strangers as no less weighty than ... neighbours"

選択肢② "moral attitude that treats the well-being of distant strangers as no less weighty than that of neighbours"

→ ほぼ機械的一致。

★ Step 3: 誤答分析

- ・ ① "frequently travels between cities for commercial purposes" → (A) 現代的誤解。本来の哲学的意味と異なる。
- ・ ③ "diplomatic official" → (B) 論点ずれ。外交官の意味は本文に無し。
- ・ ④ "rejects all moral obligations" → 本文と (C) 逆方向。コスモポリタニズムは道徳的義務を拡張する立場。

【正解】 ② A moral attitude that treats the well-being of distant strangers as no less weighty than that of neighbours.

第4章 (Q2 — NOT 設問・renaissance 要因・5 分)

SILS 頻出 NOT 設問。第 2 段の要因リストを順に消去。

【設問】 Which of the following is NOT cited as a factor in the early twenty-first-century renaissance of cosmopolitanism?

★ Step 1: 第 2 段の renaissance 要因を抽出

- (i) "the dramatic increase in cross-border movement of people, capital, and culture"
- (ii) "Philosophers such as Martha Nussbaum and Kwame Anthony Appiah argued, in influential books"
- (iii) "Universities expanded their international programmes"
- (iv) "corporations adopted language about 'global citizenship'"
- (v) "foundations funded conferences on cosmopolitan ethics"

★ Step 2: 選択肢と照合

【正解】 ④ A sudden military alliance among the major democracies.

💡 NOT 設問のコツ: 第 2 段に明示されている 3-4 要因をマーカーで囲み、選択肢と照合。「軍事 / 経済成長率 / 通貨統合」など本文に無いマクロ要因が罠の典型。

第5章 (Q3 + Q4 — 階級批判 + 著者の応答・10 分)

「批判の核心 → 著者の慎重な共感」を続けて聞く。SILS の中核設問配置。

【Q3 設問】 What is the central criticism of cosmopolitanism raised in the third paragraph?

★ 該当段 (第 3 段) の構造

第 3 段は(A) 楽観論から批判への転換を描く段落:

- ・冒頭: "That mood has since cooled."
- ・転換の契機: Brexit / nationalist 復活 / 移民への反発
- ・批判の核心: "The cosmopolitan disposition ... was less a universal moral attitude than (A) the particular taste of a particular class: those whose education, income, and professional life had placed them outside the dense local attachments that still organized most lives."

★ Q3 の paraphrase 対応

本文 "particular taste of a particular class ... outside the dense local attachments"

選択肢② "less a universal moral attitude than the particular taste of a globally mobile elite class"

→ "particular taste of a particular class" 直接一致。

【Q3 正解】 ② That it was less a universal moral attitude than the particular taste of a globally mobile elite class.

【Q4 設問】 Why does the author argue that this critique deserves a careful response?

★ 該当段 (第 4 段) の構造

第 4 段冒頭: "The critique deserves a careful response rather than easy dismissal."

根拠: "There is something accurate in noticing that (A) the strongest exponents of cosmopolitan ethics are often those for whom the costs of cosmopolitan policy are most easily borne."

具体例:

- ・ "The professor who calls for open borders rarely competes for jobs with newly arrived migrants"

・ "the financier who praises global capital flows is rarely the one whose town has been hollowed out"

★ Q4 の paraphrase 対応

本文 "costs of cosmopolitan policy are most easily borne" → 選択肢② "costs of cosmopolitan policy are often borne by those least likely to advocate for it"

【Q4 正解】② Because the costs of cosmopolitan policy are often borne by those least likely to advocate for it, giving the critique a real foundation.

★ 重要観察 — Q3 と Q4 の連動

Q3 = 批判の内容を整理 → Q4 = 著者がその批判に共感を示す。 (A) 「批判を提示し、軽視せず、しかし最終的に擁護を再構築する」 が SILS の典型論理展開。哲学的議論の (B) steel-manning (相手の最良の論を立ててから反論する) 技法。

Steel-manning — 哲学的論争の標準作法

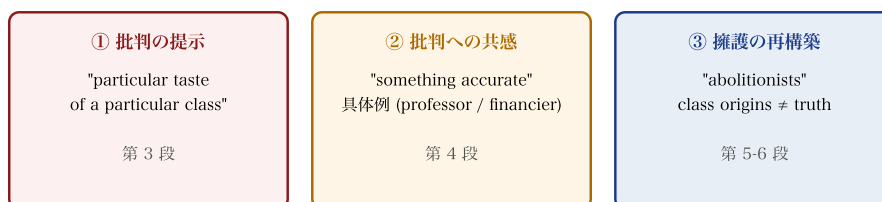

図 5-1 哲学エッセイの 3 段ロケット — 批判 → 共感 → 再構築

第6章 (Q5 — abolitionist 言及の目的・5 分)

「修辞設問 + 歴史的類比」の組み合わせ。第 5 段の論理を見抜く。

【設問】 Why does the author refer to the abolitionists of the nineteenth century?

★ Step 1: 第 5 段の構造

第 5 段は(A) 批判への反論段落:

"The fact that an ideal happens to be congenial to a particular class does not, by itself, show that the ideal is wrong; the (A) abolitionists of the nineteenth century, after all, were drawn disproportionately from comfortable backgrounds, and we do not now treat slavery as defensible on that account."

→ 論理構造: 「奴隷廃止論者も裕福な階級から多く出たが、それを理由に奴隷制を擁護する人はいない」→ つまり「支持者の階級背景は理念の真偽を決定しない」。

★ Step 2: paraphrase 対応

本文 "class origins of an ideal's supporters does not show the ideal is wrong"

選択肢② "the class origins of an ideal's supporters do not, by themselves, show the ideal to be wrong"

→ 直接的論理対応。

★ Step 3: 誤答分析

- ・① "abolitionism has failed" → 本文と(A) 逆方向。abolitionism は成功例として引用。
- ・③ "return to nineteenth-century texts" → (B) 論点ずれ。著者は読書推奨をしていない。
- ・④ "slavery was actually morally defensible" → 本文と(C) 正反対。著者は slavery を断固否定。

【正解】 ② To illustrate that the class origins of an ideal's supporters do not, by themselves, show the ideal to be wrong.

💡 哲学エッセイの修辞設問: 歴史的類比 (analogy) は「論理構造の同型性を示す」目的で引用される。X 自体の評価ではなく X が持ち出す論理形式を答える。

第7章 (Q6 — Main Idea 設問 + 関連話題・10 分)

SILS エッセイの結論は「修正主義的擁護」型。

【設問】 Which of the following best summarizes the author's overall conclusion?

★ Step 1: 最終段を精読

"Whether such a reformulation can survive the political weather of the coming decades remains to be seen. What seems clearer is that (A) the older, more confident cosmopolitanism — the one that imagined itself as the inevitable horizon of moral progress — is no longer available. The ideal will have to (B) earn its place again, in argument with the partial loyalties it once expected to dissolve."

→ 主旨 2 要素: ①古い楽観は不可能 ②部分的忠誠と対話して理念を再獲得する必要

★ Step 2: 選択肢②との対応

"The older, confident cosmopolitanism is no longer available; the ideal must earn its place again in argument with the partial loyalties it once expected to dissolve."

→ 本文最終 2 文をほぼ機械的に翻訳。

【Q6 正解】 ② The older, confident cosmopolitanism is no longer available; the ideal must earn its place again in argument with the partial loyalties it once expected to dissolve.

★ 誤答分析

- ・ ① "decisively refuted and should be abandoned" → (A) 極端化。著者は擁護を再構築。
- ・ ③ "Nationalism morally superior" → (B) 本文に nationalism 擁護なし。
- ・ ④ "All philosophical attempts to reformulate ... have proven futile" → 本文と (C) 逆。第 6 段で middle ground を肯定的に紹介。
